Provenance:
 Fortuna Fine Arts Ltd., New York, Venerable Traditions, Works of Art from the Ancient World (Exhibition Catalogue), 2007, no. 20.

Note:
 This marvelous miniature vessel was skillfully cut from a single block of rock crystal. For much of the Roman world vessels made from this material were highly desired and popular luxury items. Pliny the Elder, a Roman naturalist from the 1st Century A.D., described rock crystal as having come from ice or snow. He wrote that over time, after the ice was impacted and hardened, it would metamorphosize into rock crystal.

 Island (1914-1997).
 Ancient Objects Auction, Providence, Rhode Island,
 15 October 2017, Lot 186

Note:
 J.J. Slocum was an avid bibliophile, numismatist, and antiquarian. Beyond his exceptional collection of rare books and medieval crusader coins, he had collected antiquities. These were mostly acquired while serving as a US diplomat to Germany and Egypt in the 1960s. He would later go on to work with the Smithsonian Institution, serve on President Regan's Cultural Property Advisory Committee, and be given the title Trustee Emeritus from the Archaeological Institute of America.

Egyptian

Egyptian glass workshops during the New Kingdom used two different casting techniques to produce these stunning inlays. They would use either a melted piece of glass at the end of a rod, held above a fire and then press the glass into heated molds, or use pre-crushed glass that was fired directly into the mold. Glass inlays were used to lavishly decorate and bring vibrancy to figural scenes in composite reliefs. These reliefs and inlays could be used to adorn wooden coffins, furniture, and palace walls.

In ancient Egypt, glass production was rare and thought to be under royal monopoly. The color of royal figures in glass likely signified an important aspect of Egyptian theology. In these two examples, the use of red (Lot 39) may have served as a link to the Pharaoh's duties on Earth, while the use of blue (Lot 38) may denote his celestial role as a god.

An Egyptian Red Glass Face Inlay

 Width 7 inches (18 cm).

Provenance
 Private Collection, Europe, prior to 1986.
 Edward H. Merrin Gallery, by 1986
 Private Collection, New York, 1986-2021.
 Published:
 Edward H. Merrin Gallery, New York, The Majesty of Ancient Egypt and the Classical World (Exhibition Catalogue), 1986, p.31.

Note.
 The distinctive globular shape with cylindrical lug-handles mimics Pre-Dynastic and Old Kingdom vessels while the scale-pattern decoration (stylized grapes?) occurs mostly in the Ptolemaic Period.
 Comparable decoration is also attested in Nubian faience and terracotta vessels.

Cats

In ancient Egypt, the cat personified Bastet, the goddess of fertility, pleasure, and good health. Those hoping to conceive or seeking protection against disease would make offerings to her. This often took the form of a pilgrimage to her temple, Bubastis, or Memphis to deposit votive objects. These objects were commonly made of bronze and depict cats in various forms such as a seated cat (Lots 55, 56, & 61) and cat with kittens (Lot 57). Mummified cats were also presented as dedication to Bastet (Lot 58).

Bastet was also the protector of Lower Egypt and a daughter of the sun god, Ra. Therefore, she was the defender of both Ra and Ra's representation on earth, the pharaoh. However, by the Third Intermediate Period religion was democratized and the cult of Bastet became more widespread. Numerous cat amulets made from semi-precious stones (Lot 59) and metals (Lot 60) have been discovered from this period onward and were likely intended to endow the wearer with Bastet's powers of fecundity and wellbeing.

Often confounded with other feline-headed goddesses, Bastet is closely linked with Sekhmet. The earliest depictions of Bastet are as a lioness which showed her to be fierce and unapproachable. She was later transmogrified to a cat and seen as a more gentle, approachable, and accessible deity.

(with certificate of authenticity)

Acquired by the current owner in West Palm Beach, Florida, 2011.

$1,000 - 2,000

Depicted here is the Egyptian goddess Bastet in complete feline form. The elegant proportions, detailed face (with remnants of inlaid eyes remaining), wadjet amulet tied about the neck, and excellent state of preservation is extraordinary for a bronze of this scale. While bronze cat statues were ubiquitous throughout the Late Period, often ranging in size and quality, rarely do they capture the splendor of the species as beautifully as this life-sized example. Presumably cast from a royal workshop at Saqqara, this statue compares favorably to similar examples now on view at The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York (Inv. no.10.130.1332), and The British Museum, London (Inv. no. EA64391).

Note:

This eroticon of an ithyphallic dwarf—a symbol of male fertility in ancient Egypt—comes from the collection of Dr. Samuel-Jean Pozzi (1846-1918), a French surgeon and gynecologist with an interest in antiquity. He also had an impressive number of liaisons with the Parisian elite and friendships with renowned artists, including the painter John Singer Sargent. Sargent would later paint Pozzi in 1881 wearing a red dressing gown and title it Dr. Pozzi at Home (Hammer Museum, Los Angeles, California). Pozzi's cultured demeanor and striking appearance led him to be nicknamed "The Siren" by his peers.

During the 5th Century B.C., the kalpis became a preferred vessel for red-figure painters. Like the hydria though smaller, the kalpis was used to house water or wine. These vessels were typically decorated with mythological scenes or scenes of daily life. This red-figured kalpis, attributed to the Harrow Painter, illustrates a courting scene. In the center sits a hetaira (courtesan) holding a mirror with a dog behind her and a kalathos at her feet, flanked by two bearded males each holding a staff. Courtesans were often guests of the all-male symposium, and thus a popular subject matter for painted vessels.

Originally fabricated from terracotta, the loutrophoros was initially used to carry water during bridal ceremonies and later served as tomb monuments. As Greek culture expanded throughout the Mediterranean world so did its building program with marble as the preferred medium. By the Late Classical Period, marble became synonymous with luxury and wealth. The loutrophoros seen here, sculpted from a large block of marble and carved in low relief with patterns of architectural ornamentation, was likely commissioned by an affluent citizen who could afford its substantial cost.

Roman bronze statuettes have been found in considerable numbers throughout the Roman Empire and often with a mythological theme. Minerva, the Roman equivalent of the Greek goddess Athena, is best known for the role she played in Homer's epic poems, the Iliad and Odyssey. In the Odyssey, she assisted the hero Odysseus on his ten year journey home to the island of Ithaca. Whenever he was in grave danger, she provided divine powers of wisdom to help him escape the most impossible of situations.

Portraiture during the Late Roman Republic is renowned for its verism. The facial features on this portrait head are exaggerated to highlight his wrinkles, sunken skin, furrowed brow, and even a bulging frontal vein. Age was synonymous with wealth and power in ancient Rome. Wrinkles exuded gravitas (seriousness of mind) and virtus (virtue), which would evidently indicate a fruitful public career and triumphs. Public officials often commissioned veristic portrait busts to legitimize their authority and further associate themselves with their prestigious ancestors.

Born the second son of emperor Vespasian and the last of the Flavian dynasty, Titus Flavius Domitianus (r. 81-96 A.D.) was known for strengthening Rome's economy, terrorizing members of the senate, and completing construction on the Colosseum. For the inauguration of the amphitheater, Domitian and his brother, Titus, held more than a hundred days of games including numerous naumachiae (mock naval battles). He also constructed the hypogeum, a vast network of rooms and tunnels with advanced mechanical devices below the floor of the Colosseum. Now, instead of walking into the arena, gladiators and wild animals could emerge from anywhere using elevators and trap doors in the floor. These unprecedented special effects were sensational theatrics designed to awe Rome's audiences. The large size of this portrait head suggests that it was for public display, perhaps alongside of one of his many other constructions.

One of the most iconic and highly recognizable images from antiquity is Venus, the goddess of love. A delicate depiction of beauty, sexuality, and fertility, this exceptional black marble Venus stands apart for its unique dark hue.

To the Roman elite, the word for marble (marmor) meant more than just a type of stone. They understood and relished the degrees to which marble can portray and replicate realism. Due to complex geological processes, marble can exhibit numerous textures and colors. During the 2nd Century A.D., the most coveted stone for Roman emperors was bigio morato, a dark-gray almost black marble sourced from Africa. The most notable example of this marble used in sculpture is the Furietti Centaur Statues discovered at Hadrian's imperial palace at Tivoli. The centaurs became famous, in large part, due to the rarity and high quality of their stone. They are now on display at the Capitoline Museum in Rome, Italy.

This black marble Venus comes from the renowned collection of James and Marilyn Alsdorf (Chicago, Illinois) and must have been acquired in 1970 from Cordier & Ekstrom Gallery, New York. Together with twenty-six other paintings and sculptures, the torso was featured in a seminal exhibition called She, which showcased Matisse's Nu Blue and de Kooning's Woman on a Sign II. Hailed by the New York Times for its "imaginative conception" and "knowledgeable assembling", the exhibition highlighted representations and symbols of woman spanning 4,500 years while confronting how she has been depicted throughout the ages.

This very expressive head comes from a statue of a youthful satyr. Satyrs were part-human and part-animal creatures in Graeco-Roman mythology; they were conceived of as frolicking denizens in the woodlands, ever ready for mischief in order to satisfy their unrestrained urges. Although in ancient art satyrs were rendered in a range of styles, the youthful satyr (satyriskoi) was introduced in Greek art during the 4th Century B.C. Its popularity as a type is attested by the many later statues of young satyrs produced during the Hellenistic and Roman periods, such as the fine example seen here.

$35,000 - 45,000

This marble head of Alexander the Great is best compared to the portrait-type from Pergamon which includes some of the well established features of Alexander known from ancient sources. Even though the original surface of the marble has been lost to age, the sculpture still evokes a youthful energy and dynamic presence encountered in only the best stone portraits of the king. The anastole and long locks of hair frame Alexander's smooth fresh face and strengthen his leonine appearance. After his death in 323 B.C., many of the king's successors adopted this kind of hair style as a symbol of their royal status and ties to Alexander.

Even to this day, Alexander's likeness and hairstyle remains iconic, and is visible in every media, from movies and advertising to fine art. In 1982, Andy Warhol appropriated an ancient bronze head of Alexander for his portfolio of screenprints titled Alexander the Great (F&S, II.291-292). Commissioned by Alexander Iolas to coincide with "The Search for Alexander" exhibition at The Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York (October 27, 1982 – January 3, 1983), Warhol's screenprints brought the instantly recognizable profile of Alexander into the Pop era.

For the specific profile used by Warhol, see the Roman Bronze Head of Alexander (The Metropolitan Museum of Art, Inv. no. L.2012.4.1); For the portrait head in the Pergamon Museum, see The Search for Alexander (Exhibition Catalogue), The National Gallery of Art, Washington, DC, November 16, 1980-April 5, 1981.

From as early as the Bronze Age to as late as the Migration Period, deformed swords have been found in deposits throughout Europe. It is thought that these swords were deliberately broken or bent before being buried to render them useless in the afterlife. This tradition of ritualistically "killing" the life of a sword started with the Celts and continued into the Viking Age.

Sophisticated ceramic production in the Andes began with the Chavín civilization in the north Central Highlands of Peru (1200-500 B.C.) and continued into the Incan Empire. Artisans created pottery stirrup spout vessels, in which the two halves of the piece were made in molds, with an open spout attached to a stirrup-shaped handle. The vessels often have esoteric subject matter, but many of their animal vessels are very life-like and are even recognizable as particular species to the modern eye.

Indian,
Oceanic & African

As recently as the 19th Century, modern artists began to look beyond Western culture for inspiration. In doing so, they shed light on the diversity and quality of objects found in India, Oceania, and Africa. Today, there are entire museums dedicated to the material culture produced from these regions of the world and their exceptional craftsmanship.
